Should parents control their children's Internet use? Why or why not?

contain. According to the Post, a study in which people drank either four cups of tea or four cups of coffee in the course of a day found that even though tea has less caffeine than coffee, both coffee drinkers and tea drinkers felt more alert. Coffee drinkers, however, had more trouble falling asleep at night, so in this regard, tea seems to be the better choice.

Coffee drinkers could just drink a little less coffee to deal with that problem, though, and since in other ways coffee seems more [23] than tea, they won't want to give it up. For example, unlike tea, coffee contains fiber. Coffee drinkers will still need to get most of their fiber from fruits and vegetables, but each cup of coffee consumed will move one a little more than a gram closer to the recommended goal of about 25 grams of fiber a day.

The Post also reports that people who drink coffee or tea have less chance of suffering from heart disease or strokes than those who don't. It is possible, though, that people who drink coffee or tea have other healthy habits such as [24], so we can't say for sure that the reduced risk of heart disease and stroke is a result of drinking coffee or tea, but it might be. It looks like coffee and tea are about equal in this regard.

Many studies have also found that coffee drinkers have lower rates of various cancers. The same has not been found for tea drinkers, though there is no reason to think that drinking tea increases the risk of cancer. Still, coffee seems to be the clear winner here.

Coffee drinkers are also, according to numerous studies, less likely to develop type 2 diabetes. Tea may have similar benefits, but it is not clear. Some studies suggest that it does, while others indicate that it does not.

Both beverages may contribute to longevity. According to the Post, "a study of 172,000 people found that people who drank 2.5 to 4.5 cups of coffee per day had a 30 percent [25] during the roughly seven years of the study compared to people who didn't drink coffee." Studies of tea drinkers have had similar results.

Both coffee and tea seem to be good for us, so go have a cup of whichever drink you prefer.
